

"WHILE"

Annotations to a poem by Clark Coolidge

WHILE

Clark Coolidge's poetry is proof that the word can resonate a priori. In his most abstract poems, meaning is made without reference to any experience or definition. The twelve poems presented here coincide with Coolidge's poem "While," extending his diction into new universes with their own longings, soundscapes, and grammars.

While

broken bridge hummingbird the ladder

*Paige Parsons
Jess Hazlewood*

Emily Bludworth de Barrios

air desired

high tranquilities

saraband terranean

Sophia Marina

Diana Hamilton

silver discs

trellis breaking hue longitudes

*Kal Victor
Ethan Plaue*

*twined columns
twined columns*

while orange column

Cy March

intrigue lamed

pi moving in nineteen

Sarah Cavar

chet

mem tet

*Molly Williams
Alana Solin*

hot half no end

Anna Morrison

The Bridge

Paige Parsons

Each place, each place I've called home is bisected in origin by water, in time by roads and the bridges carry me across each time, home home not home.

I release the thought after moving it from right brain to left and back.

The bridge might be a placebo or diversion.

We cross it in pleasure, dreaming its collapse.

We cross it and drive up the hill, past the house where it happened.

It happened / it is not happening, it is not happening, not now.

Riveted to the empty sound, I wait, listen.

Mute house.

We cross the state line and in Kansas, it is Sunday,
and we have already not gone to church.

The bridge bows, and on it I find a still, dead starling: fresh red and almost with us.

Where death shouldn't be, in plain sight. We lose things on the bridge.

We go down with it.

this to the reflection of the verdure

Ethan Plaue

breaking hue
but it is equally green before the leaves are expanded longitude blue mixed with the yellow of the sand I made a mistake owing as markets do little meadows little ones and twos letting myself down carefully sarab sarab saraband of the

SARU sara

sar sar lamed sarabv saraband

I ask Joaquín if he likes the music

Emily Bludworth de Barrios

I ask Joaquín if he likes the music I play for him each night

Joaquín says Pirái Vaca's classical guitar is "ghost music"

The room at night is filled with the eyes of ghosts

Plastic stars fixed on the ceiling Pirái Vaca plucks his guitar and drops the notes Water becomes glossy with light

The room made into a box of evening

And in a distant distant distant city the Pirái River exists

Or the river passes through the city renewing itself

like a mind composing itself again in every fresh moment

The room is a box filled with sparks staining the air

Ghosts startle from Pirái Vaca's soul leaning over the water

Joaquín one day these nights will be a ghost that leans out toward you

I Torque / You Torque

Sophia Marina

ramrod the trellis straight shot climb writhing ivy silver wire / axis higher terse enough in terranean slow mo a hummingbird horde dips neck / nectar wrecked red breasted behemoth begs you to unmute your beacon / its seeping ugly twined twice around the bamboo shoot no looting / i loot you

I just saw a bird

Jess Hazlewood

reflected in the corner of my laptop screen wings expanded behind the rounded slope silhouette of my shoulder a soft shifting like running your finger through flour (or a smudging of charcoal across a textured paper) (or the running rivulet of water across a car window) and before I could understand my heart

lifted

Summer, Greenwood

Kal Victor

Dirt divulges the curb

Checkered panties on And it's picnic season

So many winking vistas
But where do these things grow

Still gardens breed banishment Fractioning moments of trespass

The trellis was always blank Corners wiped clean by sunlight

Readily then I wilt anywhere Congealed by the borders

Petalfall strides the stillwater Supplants the movement of crowds trellis the the w while tet tet tet mem columns chet

Worlds Per Year

Diana Hamilton

A song should be useful for both dancing and crying.
See them gaily gad about.
In "Pandora's Box," Summer says that "promises were made to be broken—that's all that I ever learned from loving you." Earlier genres promised less change. It is possible to put more feeling into the arrangement of discs on a pre-dinner table than one typically puts into prayer.
One girl was the first to ever fall from the ropes course. This followed mastery of instructions to tickle. Centaurs meant a lot to her. That year, fertilizer made her roses turn blue on the trellis. I guess the hues they absorb affect the hues they put out. "Oh you took me to the very top. And then I took a bad (and) long long drop." One reason offered for banning The Bridge to Terabithia is its "elaborate fantasy world that might lead to confusion." It is not banned for promoting heterosexuality.

You broke my heart; I broke your leg.
In art a ladder sometimes masks as institutional critique the desire to reach heaven. In A Wrinkle in Time, someone grows "wings made of rainbows, of light upon water," and of something worse, but Calvin isn't supposed to kneel at the sight. In The Motion of Light on Water, Delany describes coming to understand that he and his wife were raised in two "totally different cultures" when he learns that her pants lack pockets.
Someone said yes when she meant no. This was worse than the times she had spoken correctly. She devoted a few years of her adult stage to the study of the late style of Burroughs, of all the wife murderers. We are moving in to the second half of a life that, to date, has no end. Everyone hot, to my knowledge, dealt with their childhood confusion with the help of elaborate fantasy worlds.

There is orange in the second column from the left of Hilma af Klint's Altarpiece. She experienced a pupal stage where it was still possible to find the presence of women alone auspicious. Three men in breastplates and conical steel caps, burnished till they shone like silver, were making their way. The gunslinger followed. She understood the pain of quiet where sound had been expected.

from Freeman's Women

Molly Williams

In his 1947 book Psychosurgery, Walter Freeman documents case histories of roughly one hundred of his lobotomy patients, mostly women, through pre-and post-surgical narratives and photographs. These cases are fictional.

64.

I, lover, fighter,
knees poised to spring, fed up with waiting in a nursing's winter, a hot season of anger—I stand before you naked of all aims, broken the way an eagle breaks the air, bereft of the emotions you will later read onto my closed and open mouth and fists, lipstick on a gorilla, apron on a fire, banana peel in gasoline, a woman unpeeling, bananas, a fire in a brain to be burnt up and breathed out in one column of yellow skin.

71.

The cookies are baked.
The kids are asleep.
Everyone is fed.
I take the laundry out and I bring the dry back in.
I remember nothing of how the air once was, before, when I was asleep.
The kids bake in sun.
The cookies are taken out and the kids brought in.
I take out the husband and feed the sky, asleep.
The cookies feed the kids.
I feed the dry clothes into the fryer.
I fry the sleep. I feed the sun. I bake the brain of the whole operation and I put my lips on, perfect as a stain.

On a Clear Day

Cy March

1.

The muffled outline of something, there, in the corner.

A stillness sharpened into a dull point.

A bowl of cherries, blue and fuzzing itself over.

2.

They're talking about Agnes Martin together, thinking about eternity stretched in a yellow field.

That they don't have to worry, not tonight at least.
It is so dark it is almost orange, the night and the orange dark room.

Their half-spoiled bodies unto each other, perennial holes in the toes,
"Love, Nana" stitched in the corner.

3.

How we find ourselves by ourself like a stray thread, a shirt fallen off its hanger—but not just guessing at itself, at its boundaries,
 where it extends,
but knowing.

How by ourself we came to be here together, the night before and pre-before, a continual knowing backwards, loose objects in the dark.

twined

silver

air

from Whale

Anna Morrison

In the womb, a pearl provides illumination.

Sight lines

(the only planks) leap to sea bream.

Ribs articulate, but do not cage.

Ribs make a slimy balcony.

I feel

tightlacing:

lead and copper wire clasp stained glass into a third-floor eye-frame.

There's spear-leaved palms for shade and common dolphins to breach horizon—does mercy now extend to them?

An animal binds many plants into one volume.
I was half-bound.

Did I hallucinate the Gulf Stream?

(My Apocrypha is leggy and green.

Swallow a man,
filter plankton.

Did I blow bubbles at school for baitball?)

An eye-mask protects with darkness.

Sound enters my ear through the throat.

Out of Mind & Into Body

Sarah Cavar

I am in the thick of water. Below my rocks - my childhood Moss, pain-splattered boots to mark my place; posts we keep above the water, trunks and love left in the cabin. Here is the river the sum mer I seek to swim through, white light to sole.

So I am nineteen. I am a long pause. I'm fifteen, a distance between desk and face.
I am the act of holding onto voices, still crooked tween my self and body Is all lost-? I mean to say, "post-." -- I mean, to speak the present tense yearnahalf n change.

Out of the Steppe I

Alana Solin

out of the steppe i accept yeses flared ink in the divot

canvas bright nickel hue scraped through with scraped through saltine in havoc broken grain in the bathwater

door slammer i scatter

complete stipple showering apple rosin for grip fife for an instinct

water for the warbling vireo

acreage no further must be a climbing

a widen ing acr

"While" is reprinted from Clark Coolidge's Selected Poems 1962-1985 (Station Hill of Barrytown, 2016). The poem is dated between 1967 and 1969.

Certain of the poems in this issue have been previously published, including Paige Parsons' "The Bridge" in The Quarterless Review and Sarah Cavar's "Out of Mind & Into Body" in Luna Luna Magazine.

Calligraphy by Alana Solin.

Typeset and designed by Serena Solin and Gili Ostfield.

Printed and bound in Queens, New York.

Poems by Paige Parsons, Ethan Plaue, Emily Bludworth de Barrios, Sophia Marina, Jess Hazlewood, Kal Victor, Diana Hamilton, Molly Williams, Cy March, Anna Morrison, Sarah Cavar, and Alana Solin.

Chintz Davenport Editions